In 2009, the Nunavummi Avatilikivin Katimain (NIRB) initiated a process to review and update the Nunavut Land Code (NLC). The process involved public consultations, expert reviews, and stakeholder engagement. The document detailed the changes made to the NLC, including amendments to the Nunavut Land Code Act and the Nunavut Land Rights Act. The changes were intended to reflect the evolving needs and aspirations of Nunavut's Inuit population.

The process was supported by the Government of Nunavut, with funding provided by the federal government. The work was led by a team of experts, including lawyers, anthropologists, and community representatives. The document highlighted the importance of respecting Inuit rights and interests, and the need for a code that was responsive to the unique circumstances of Nunavut.

The document also included a section on the implications of the changes, including the potential impact on land use and development plans. It emphasized the need for ongoing dialogue and engagement with Inuit communities, to ensure that the new code reflected their needs and aspirations.

Contact information was included, along with a website for more information on the project. The document concluded with a call for feedback and participation in the ongoing process, to ensure that the new code was inclusive and responsive to the needs of Nunavut's Inuit population.
